Federal budget plan could cut commercial flights at Burlington a

POSTED 5:57 PM, MARCH 30, 2017, BY CHRISTINA HEPNER, UPDATED AT 06:49AM, MARCH 31, 2017

BURLINGTON, Iowa - Kathy Martinez is planning for a big trip in December and she uses the Southeast Iowa Regional airport to fly to St. Louis.

"I'm only 20 minutes away, so it's nice and safe and easy to get on the plane and start my vacation," said Kathy Martinez, passenger.

Burlington's Southeast Iowa Regional airport would lose its flights to Chicago, St. Louis and Minneapolis with President Donald Trump's 2018 budget proposal.

"We don't really know what that means long term for our economic base but we know that it will have a negative impact on us," said Jim Ferneau, Burlington city manager.
The airport would also lose around $40,000 that they make each year off of the commercial flights.

"Rental from the Air Choice One, TSA renting the space here, also something called passenger facility charges which that goes away as well," said Mary Beaird, Southeast Iowa Regional airport director.

For Kathy, she'll be disappointed if she can't use this airport.

"We're older now so safety's more important, so I rather us fly than worry about his driving," said Martinez.

The airport sees around 15,000 passengers each year.

If the budget does go through the airport won't entirely close because they provide other aviation services to the reg
Computer outage disrupts customs at US airports

Airline electronics ban: What you need to know
TSA calls in bomb squad to handle suspicious computer at Quad City International Airport

Burlington seeking extradition of two St. Louis area suspects accused of murdering Kedarie Johnson

6 missing after small plane loses contact over Lake Erie
Fireball Run reality series picks Burlington as a host city